

National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment

All the ingredients are there for some energetic thunderstorms to form first during the afternoon in eastern Scotland, transferring across parts of the central lowlands and southern Scotland by evening, as well as parts of northern England. 20 mm or more of rain could fall in a short space of time, with the possibility that a few spots could receive more than double this amount in a couple of hours, leading to possible problems with run-off and surface flooding.

It should be noted that such totals are not expected to be widespread, with some places within the warning area escaping the showers entirely. This is an update to the warning issued yesterday, whilst a separate Amber warning has been issued for parts of southeast Scotland where the risk of disruption is considered to be greatest.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 13:00 on Mon, 20th May 2013 until 23:00 on Mon, 20th May 2013

Heavy showers and thunderstorms, with localised hail, are expected to develop in places through the afternoon and evening. The public should be aware that in some localities, these could be sufficiently intense and slow-moving to generate some disruption due to localised flooding.
